

The 2 Job Hunters

A supervisor encountered two job applicants during a day of job interviews. He gave each of them a task as part of the testing.

Later, the men met at a pizza place to compare notes.

“Boy, was that supervisor stupid!” exclaimed Applicant No. 1. “He gave me a $5 bill, then told me to go buy him a Porsche. The dummy didn’t even tell me what color he wanted!”

“You think that’s bad,” replied Applicant No. 2. “We were doing the interview in this conference room, see, and he says, ‘Go up to my office, and see if I’m there. If I’m not there, come back and tell me.’ What a moron! There was a phone right there in the conference room. He could have called up to his office to see if he was there. He didn’t have to send me!”

No. 1 shook his head sadly. “Sure glad I didn’t get the job. Who wants to work for an idiot?”

“I hear you,” his companion said.

Turning to the waitress, the first man asked for a pepperoni pizza.

“Would you like that cut into six or eight slices?” the waitress asked.

“Better make it six,” the second man replied. “I don’t think we’re hungry enough for eight.”

Such a story “tickles the funnybone,” as my grandmother used to say. And that’s a good thing. In Life Care, Century Park and Life Care at Home, we are involved in very serious business, taking care of our residents.

A good laugh, however, provides some much-needed relief. After all, good humor makes all things tolerable.
